Professor George E. Gordon Catlin came to see me. He threw off a couple of ideas. One, inspired by a recent article in Life, about the wide use of the English language, was to form an international institution to further its use. The other was to erect a statue of Lord Chatham in Washington.

Tonight, I attended the Yale-Harvard-Princeton dinner at the Dorchester. The guest speaker was Alan Bullock, Master of St. Catherine's College, Oxford. He delivered a graceful, amusing, interesting address, perfectly suited to the occasion.

I went this morning to see von Etzdorf, the German Ambassador, at 22 Belgrave Square. I spent almost an hour with him. He was in Bonn last week at a Foreign Office meeting with key colleagues, such as Grewe, Blankenhorn, Kroll, and their Ambassador in Italy. Their recommendation was that at this time the Federal Republic should not engage in any bilateral talks with the Soviet Government. I think this is right under present conditions, but should be reviewed in a couple of months, unless something unexpected makes it advisable to do so earlier.

von Etzdorf is an intelligent man. He said the Chancellor had completely recovered from a bout of influenza, and from his own observation was as alert mentally and healthy physically as ever.

The MacLaren of MacLaren lunched with me at the office. I knew him years ago when he was attached for a time to OSS from British Security Services. He returned to England to rejoin his regiment, The Queen's Own Cameron Highlanders, and towards the end of the war was back in intelligence work, first in Paris, and afterwards for three years in Berlin.
